PREFACE

A critical index to Lucilius is as ambitious an undertaking as it is a necessary one. The fragmentary nature of the Satires has baffled editors and translators alike for centuries, and a quick comparison of two or three text editions of more recent years shows immediately the vast divergence of editors' opinions and interpretations regarding the nature, order, and arrangement of the various extant fragments. More often than not, these fragments are too brief or too corrupt to permit interpretation and assignation with total confidence and comfort, and a text edition of the Satires without a concordance to other editions is virtually unthinkable.

In view of these problems, an index verborum to Lucilius becomes a sine qua non for serious preoccupation with the Satires, and we have produced this index with the hope that it may become an aid to further scholarship in the area of Roman satire in general and Lucilian satire in particular. It is based upon Terzaghi's 1944 edition of the Satires,<sup>1</sup> a creditable work which attempts to arrange the fragments in as logical a manner as possible. Terzaghi has joined lines, which had heretofore been scattered among the various satires, on the basis of their connected, or at least related, thought. While this re-arrangement of lines may be the meritorious effort of one editor and while it may not concur with the opinions of others, we have nevertheless found ourselves in general agreement with Terzaghi's edition and have based our index on his system of citation. We do not refer to satire numbers, inasmuch as there has been little or no agreement regarding the assignment of specific passages to specific satires. Indeed, some editors feel that the later books of the Lucilius corpus should be earlier, and vice versa. In order to avoid confusion in this connection and in order to provide the reader with reasonable ease of reference, we have cited the words not according to book and line within the book, but according to Terzaghi's own continuous line arrangement. Reference to his edition is invaluable, since he carries the corresponding line numbers of Marx and Lachmann. Although the problem of arrangement continues and will continue until studies in Lucilian satire have been brought to a satisfactory completion, the reader will be able, at least, to conduct comparative investigations of the major editions which predate Terzaghi.

The arrangement of inflected words follows that of the paradigms in the standard Latin grammars. The first form cited, unless otherwise identified, is understood to be that of the entry form. Thus, nouns are listed according to the recognized order of cases, i.e. amicus, amici, amico, amicum, etc. Adjectives, for which the first form is understood to be that of the masculine nominative singular unless otherwise indicated, are cited in the following order: bonus, bona, bonum, boni, bonae, boni, bono, etc. Comparative and superlative forms of adjectives and adverbs are recorded with the article for the positive forms. Thus, melior will be found under bonus. However, in order not to destroy the alphabetical order and thereby create confusion for the reader, we have double-indented all related forms under the article containing the positive listing. Verbs are cited according to the recognized rules for conjugation, following the order of tense, voice, and mood, i.e. laudo, laudas, laudat, etc., laudor, laudabo, laudabor, laudabam, laudabar, laudavi, laudatus sum, laudaveram, laudatus eram, laudavero, laudatus ero, laudem, lauder, laudarem, laudarer, laudaverim, laudatus sim, laudavissem, laudatus essem, lauda, laudate, laudare, laudari, laudavisse, laudatus esse, laudaturus esse, laudatum iri, laudans, laudaturus, laudatus, laudandi (gerund), laudandus, laudatum (supine), and the periphrastic constructions. Substantives which are formed from verbs will be found in the article related to the verb.

In general, all forms are identified to the extent that is necessary without being superfluous or confusing. Where no definite entry form could be ascertained from either the Latin dictionaries or the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, we have supplied an entry form which would be logical and consistent with the rules and patterns of the Latin language. For example, we have assumed the entry form despeculo for despeculassere (727), even though this verb is not listed in the dictionaries or the TLL. In the case of Greek words transliterated into Roman characters, we have retained the Greek orthography in determining the heading, e.g. oxydous - oxyodontes (1073). The latter procedure is applied only in the case of those words which did not become a bona fide part of the Latin language.

The future perfect and the perfect subjunctive are identified either by comment or by order within the article. At times, however, when a line is so irreparably fragmented that it does not allow definitive identification of the words contained in it, we have resorted to double entries. The same procedure was adopted for neuter nouns of the second declension, usually in instances in which the line contained two or three words at the most. For third-declension nouns, we have identified -is forms only when they are to be regarded as the accusative plural; if such identification is lacking, the form is to be taken as the genitive singular. Nouns of the fourth and fifth declensions present a special problem, since Lucilius used the -e and -u endings freely to indicate ablative as well as the genitive and dative singular. Where these endings are intended to signify a case other than the ablative, they are clearly identified to that effect; if no identification appears, they are to be regarded as the ablative. In some instances, an apostrophe is found in the text to indicate the dropping of a final -s. Since it does not stand for any other letter, we have thought it unnecessary to identify the form in question as masculine or second person singular, as the case may be.

Terzaghi's distinction between u and v has been retained in the index, although both spellings are carried in their alphabetical order as if they were spelled with u. Hence, uel and vel are listed together.

Words which are spelled with Greek characters, or predominantly with Greek characters, are listed separately in the Vocabula Graeca. It should be noted here that although Lucilius also uses a great many Greek words transliterated into Roman characters, we have decided to cite these words in the Latin rather than the Greek index. The rationale for this method of citation is that the reader should not be expected to leaf through the Greek index to find that cacosyntheton is listed under κ or tensus under θ. However, certain oddities, which are more Greek than Latin in their orthography, are carried in the Greek index, e.g. hoχληρωδες is entered under οχληρωδες on the assumption that the scribe, in a moment of somnolence, substituted the letter h for the Greek rough breathing. Properly, this word could not be carried under the Roman h and a reader should not be expected to search for it under the Roman o. While our efforts might have inclined toward separating Lucilius' Greekisms from his Latin vocabulary, we may perhaps justify our arrangement on the grounds that the purpose of an index is to facilitate location of a specific form.

Since Terzaghi's text and apparatus criticus often record both assimilated and unassimilated forms, we were faced with the problem of order when one or the other was absent. To achieve consistency and to spare the reader the inconvenience of searching for the desired citation, we have entered both forms under the assimilated heading, even when no assimilated form is used. However, we have inserted cross-references where the unassimilated form would normally be found.

In the citation of conjunctions, we have followed the standard procedure of separating them according to the mood which they govern; where no verb is to be understood, we cite the conjunction along with the notation verbo subaudito. In some instances, however, where the line is so corrupt or fragmented that the verb originally governed by the conjunction has disappeared and its mood would be a case of pure conjecture, we carry the conjunction under the citations for the verbo subaudito.

Although we have attempted to be as complete and accurate as possible, we found ourselves forced to omit from the index several passages carried in Terzaghi's text. In all cases, these are passages which stand in complete or partial italics and which represent not actual lines of Lucilius, but paraphrases by grammarians, commentators, and editors of what Lucilius may have said. Usually, these passages stand in the oratio obliqua and merely suggest a line or subject treated by Lucilius. For example, Terzaghi's line 1338 reads: Qd-tendit quid sit furor, ut Lucilius (Porphyr. Hor. sat. II 3, 41). This line may well have read originally: quid est furor. We have thought it inaccurate and misleading to carry such quotations in the index. Thus, the present index represents an effort to record all the words, but only those words, which, in Terzaghi's opinion, are direct quotations from Lucilius.

At all times we have striven for consistency. Where consistency might have resulted in confusion or awkwardness, we have preferred to aim instead for ease of reference for the reader, without violating the basic principles of construction of a useful index. Ultimately, our goal is to aid further research in Lucilian satire.

We should like to express our gratitude to Mr. Barry Glass for his patient and painstaking assistance and to the University of California for its support in our undertaking.
